

I feel like my learning style is a mix of reading and writing with a bit of tactile mixed in. I'm good with reading and writing because I can go at my own pace and absorb as much information as I can in any given time frame, but I can also go back and review easily as well. Writing is a good way to connect everything I've read together and expand on what I've learned. Tactile is also pretty good for me as well, because it's a bit of trial and error- I actually experience what works and what doesn't. But visual and audial doesn't work for me- it just doesn't absorb or stay 'in my brain.' So to speak. That all being said, I do think your learning style affects how you learn. For example, I spent most of my academic career inhaling books, and when doing tactile learning, like experiments in science class, I could better remember the steps and facts that went into the lesson because I experienced them.